Great teachers are skillful experience-creators.

Although it’s certainly necessary at times for teachers to explain and demonstrate, our students learn most when they engage in activities that ask them to interpret, reason, write, and solve problems, all of which can lead to students uncovering and working through gaps in their understanding. Designing tasks that illuminate these gaps and providing strategic opportunities for productive muddling are what great teaching and effective learning are all about.